

We travel a great deal in a motor home. We purchased a satellite radio to be able to get reliable travel information on the road. There are so many radio broadcasters in many local areas it is nigh impossible to find quality information in a timely manner. In other areas there are very few radio broadcasters and those that do exist operate in a manner to serve the local listening audience as opposed to the traveler just passing by. It is my opinion that the limitations sought by the NAB are solely to protect their businesses which for too long have been one of the most profitable areas of business in terms of return on equity of all categories of business. To grant their wishes would not only intensify their monopoly status but stifle the advancement of new technology that is beneficial to the many RV owners across the US.

It seems to me that the FCC should get an opinion from the RV industry lobby to understand this issue.
